80s music trivia questions and answers

LaraBelova/E-/Getty Images Some humorous quiz questions are: Before you legally buy a mousetrap in California, a person must get what first? What is illegal in France to do in a vineyard?; and where is it illegal to fall down and sleep in South Dakota? The answers are mostly funny laws. A person in California must first buy a hunting license to legally buy a mousetrap. It is illegal to land a flying saucer in a French vineyard. In a cheese factory in South Dakota, it's not legal to fall down and sleep. Other humorous trifle scares are other funny laws, including: Use a fork in Georgia to do what is illegal?; What kind of animal do people not tease because it is illegal in Minnesota?; and what does a person need to own five of them in Blythe, California, before legally wearing cowboy boots? In Georgia, hungry diners can't use a fork to eat fried chicken. In Minnesota, no one can legally lease a skunk. Before wearing cowboy boots in Blythe, California, the wearer must first own five cattle. As a bonus-humorous little thing question, this irony is at its finest: Which unfortunate boat captain once said: I have never had an accident worth talking about? It was Captain E.J. Smith of the Titanic. Today, our culture rewards strong opinions and quick-drawing conclusions. At a time when each side seems convinced that it has the answers, The Atlantic and HBO are working on a series of short films that challenge our certainties. Civil discourse ultimately depends on the realization that none of us have a complete understanding of the world – and that we are best at dealing with arguments that counter our deepest beliefs. Bad news for quiz lovers everywhere: HQ Trivia, the live cell phone trivia game, is shutting down and dismissing its remaining 25 full-time employees, according to CNN. On Friday, users tried to claim leftover prize money - and had to face error messages when trying to spend money. Launched in 2017 and won a massive episode next year by inviting users twice a day for 15-minute video segments and the chance to win cash prizes by asking questions correctly Paired with an eccentric comedic host Scott Rogowsky, the addictive trivia game easily reached the top of the App Store charts. However, the company's internal problems made headlines just a year after its launch. Complaints about late payouts and an explosive CEO shuffle quickly dropped his millions of once-invested users. (Co-founders Rus Yusupov and Colin Kroll also launched 6-second streaming 6-second streaming Vine. Kroll died of an overdose in December 2018.) One of HQ Trivia's more notable public relations nightmares came after controversial entrepreneur Peter Thiel was unveiled as a financial supporter. In a company-wide email obtained by CNN, Yusupov said that leading investors are no longer willing to fund the company, and so effectively the headquarters will cease operations and move on to dissolution. HQ CEO Rus Yusupov has just sent a note to the employees (25 full-time employees): "This is one of the hardest things to do in my life, and I #39;l really regret any disruption that can cause you and our players."pic.twitter.com/MOWfs434m1 &mdash; Kerry Flynn ???? (@kerryflynn) February 14, 2020, in early 2019, HQ Trivia announced that it has received USD 10 million in ad revenue. This was followed by sponsorships with General Motors, Nike and Warner Bros. But later that year, in July, she fired 20% of her employees, prompting other employees to leave as well. Reports of low morale and cash shortages led HQ Trivia to switch its business model to more in-app purchases. As users became increasingly uninterested in the game, revenue began to decline, and executives began developing other gaming apps like HQX to keep viewers' attention. Ultimately, despite Yusupov's push to find additional investors and partners to support the company's expansion, all efforts failed, according to CNN. After learning the news, some social media users wondered if they would still be able to receive payouts from previous profits. Some tried to pay off their earnings with the app and ran into error messages. Hey @hqtrivia sorry y'all are closed now, but does this mean I can't withdraw my last winnings?? Just tried for the last few minutes and no luck. What about the prize money we've run? &mdash; Melissa Bargrover (@MelissaB425) February 14, 2020 When Jean Henegan tried to spend money on Friday afternoon, she was confronted with an error message. I'm stuck at 13.85 dollars [and] I can't pay out. Henegan told Digital Trends. I've received notifications about the payout in the last two days, but I thought it would be okay. Henegan added that she had never received a notification of the payout. HQ Trivia did not immediately return a request from Digital Trends to ask if the players were still Receive cash prizes collected in the game. At its peak, HQ Trivia had 15 million all-time installations. Last month, there were only 67,000, according to a Sensor Tower spokesman. At least it will be a good way to make it by 3p.m. on a weekday. The editors' recommendations Keep up to date with the BuzzFeed Daily Newsletter! My daughter has asked a lot of questions lately. We shared some just us the other night after her brother fell asleep, and she wanted to know whose idea it was to get a divorce –my or that of her father? Oh boy. I gave her a diplomatic well, it was what we both wanted... Answer, but it wasn't up to date. No mother, I mean, who said the words first? She asked. Who said 'I want a divorce' for the first time? He did, and he did it in an email because he didn't have the courage to say it to my face. Well, it wasn't really like that, darling, I stopped. We were both unhappy for a long time, so when we finally discussed it, it wasn't a surprise and it was what we both thought about. Why didn't you try to advise you? She persisted. Kaya said at school that her parents sought counseling and they didn't divorce. Yes, it works for some people, honey. People who have not involved any other woman that the man firmly plans to live a life with... Maybe you should try. Maybe it would work for you. Anna, I know you mean well, and I know you want this to work instead of getting a divorce, but that's just not going to be. Her father and I went too far behind us and tried to figure this out. That's what's happening now, even if it's not what's easiest or what feels best for everyone at this moment. She eventually changed the subject and we talked about school and life and movies and life and our favorite taste of Pixie Sticks and Life. Then she fell asleep, and I watched her and felt the weight again to let her down. One day she will ask these questions again, and she will get more honest answers. She certainly doesn't need to know every detail, and I never want to denigrate her father. He is the only father she has, after all, and despite his bad choices, he is still a good guy, in his heart. But she should know that there is a point where you have to decide how much more you can take. When you realize that you have children, and they see them as a model for the relationships they will have in the future. If you know, beyond any doubt that you have to stand up for yourself and for your daughter – and who they become, she will grow. It makes us uncomfortable, slightly superstitious and maybe even a little queasy. So we dodge the topic on the left and set the new sensation. But here you are, reading about wills if it gives you an eerie feeling in the pit of your stomach). You have already made it this far and we are proud of you. So take a deep breath –we're about to answer everything you wanted to know (but were afraid to ask for wills). 1. What is a will? Simply put, a will is a legally binding document that explains exactly how you want to treat your property and other items after your death. We we not consenting to talk about such a thing. But making a will is one of the most important things you can do for yourself and your family, however creepy you may be. 2. What is the difference between a living trust and a will? A living trust and a will may look similar in the way they work, but they are different. A will tells everyone how you want the stuff you own to be treated after you die. A living trust keeps your fortune while you are still alive. Not sure how to talk about your end-of-life wishes? Use this free guide. A living trust never becomes a public document, as a will does after death. So if you want to keep everything private, a living trust protects this information even after you're gone. It can also help you skip on estate costs (this is the court case, which deals with everything in the will). Any quality given by a will must go through probate, but not if it is given by trust! Remember, however, that a living trust cannot name a guardian for your children (in other words, someone who cares for them when you die) – only a will can do so. 3. Why do I need a will? You might think you don't need a will because you're not a millionaire, you're not sitting on a huge piece of land, or you don't have family members who are vultures and want to claw their way into your property. But guess what? You need a will, no matter who you are. If you have children under the age of 18, you really need a will. Your will is where you have all the information about who your guardians will be. If you don't make a will, who will take care of your children if something happens to you and your spouse? Do not leave such a decision in the hands of someone other than you (especially not the state!). And what about this unique watch that your grandpa gave you? They want to make sure that something like this stays in the family. With a will in place, you can say exactly who gets what. If you don't care now, someone else will decide where your children, pets and family heirlooms will end up. 4. What if I don't have children yet? So you think it's not important to make a will because you don't have children yet? False. We have just said it, but it is worth repeating: everyone needs a will! Even if it is only you and your dog who live in a one-bedroom apartment. Who would take Rover if something happened to you? And if you have kids later on the street or a niece you love, you can update your will to include them! Meet these 7 before you create your will and take the headaches out of the process. 5. Do I have to make a new will when moving between states? No. Most states across America will honor a will signed in another state. But if you are planning to move, it is wise to review the laws in your new state and update your will if necessary. 6. Do I have to be notarised with a will? You always need two witnesses to make a will valid, but you don't always need it notarized (check the your state). If you notarise a document, it simply means that an official (called a notary) will ensure that the person who signs the document is the person they say they are. Some states want a document (a self-evidence affidavit) from the witnesses who say that they have seen you sign the will or see someone sign it for you at your request. This document also proves that you were in the right spirit and willingly signed everything. With this in place saves a lot of time in estate (remember, this is just the court case, which takes care of giving everything in the will). A little note about your witnesses – make sure you don't leave anything in your will (because they don't get what it is!). A witness cannot receive anything of the will he testifies to. So skip your daughter (who gets your house in the will) to be your witness and ask instead a trusted employee or family friend. 7. Can I change or cancel my will? Absolutely! This thing is not set in stone. Nothing is permanent until you die. You can add or remove things at any time. As soon as you do this, sign a new will stating that the old one is no longer valid. After you sign the new will, be sure to get rid of your old will (shred the sucker). And if you've given copies to someone else, be sure you're the one who shreds them. In this way, there will be no confusion as to which will is the right will. And if you want to cancel your will, you can. All that means is that you destroy your old will (you know, crush it) and make a new one. 8. When should I update my will? You need to update your will at any time if your desires change or after some kind of life event (such as getting married, bringing home a brand new baby, etc.). And you may need to update your will for any kind of unpleasant life change (as in the case of the death of a family member or a divorce). When life changes, your will must change. 9. To whom shall I give copies according to the will? After you sign a will, keep a copy (duh) for yourself and give a copy of it to the person you have named as your personal representative (this is someone you trust who will ensure that your wishes after your death are fulfilled). If you choose not to give them a physical copy of the will, at least let them know where to keep your will so that they can achieve it when they need it. You'll ever update your will, be sure to get rid of the copies that others have –and do it yourself! If you trust them with your will, you probably trust them very much. Nevertheless, it is a good idea to shred the old document itself. 10. What happens to my things if I don't have a will? Whether you know it or not, you already have a will on the spot . . . A kind. Even if you've never signed a will, there are laws in your state that deal with how you sort your property if you don't have a will. This type of thing is called the intestinal law. And that's basically a fancy way of saying that the state will sort for you if you do not have a will. But then your family is in a mess. You will be on the farm for a while – and that is a real headache! If you die without a will, the probate court will decide which of your family members will receive your property, your belongings and even your children under the age of 18 (yikes!). Don't let that happen. Creating a will is one of the most important and loving things you can do for your family. Believe it or not, it's easy to make your own will online in less than 20 minutes! All you have to do is plug in your important information, and the rest is done for you. And best of all, this process won't ice you with a lot of nonsense legal jargon. Take this step today! Today!
